12.3 Mentorship

Mentoring is an effective method of helping inexperienced individuals develop and progress in their profession. Relationships need to be built before any effective mentoring can take place. An environment of trust and mutuality must be established. The mentor should greet the mentee warmly and help the mentee identify his or her professional needs and goals. The mentor should learn about the mentee's educational background and experience, and share information about his or her own background and experience. The mentor can then continue to build upon the mentee's strengths, needs, and goals throughout the mentoring period. Feelings are important, and greater trust is established when a mentee feels he or she can safely share thoughts and feelings with the mentor.
